

Moving Forward With Your Life While Maintaining Social Distance

Did you know you can continue to craft and implement an estate plan while maintaining social distance? Whether you are in the midst of the planning process or want to begin a review of your existing plan, we at Bove & Langa are continue to work with our clients on a full service basis. Until the end of the required social distancing, we will work with each of our clients to provide multiple options for communication and conferences. Additionally, we will provide each client with alternatives for signing documents in a manner that alleviates our clients' concerns regarding person-to-person contact. Up-dates to estate plans can continue to move forward. For documents that require witnesses and notarization to be binding, we will discuss the options available for you. Also, you'll be glad to know that the Firm has been working with other trust and estates lawyers across the Commonwealth to implement a temporary law which would permit remote witnessing and notarization. Stay tuned.

Finally, after the current public health crisis passes, Bove & Langa will commit to work with each of our clients who signed during social distancing to resign all documents using the tried and true methods we have always employed. Signing your estate plan at your lawyer's office helps mitigate possible future attacks of improper signing, lack of competency or undue influence. But for now, we are trying to provide you with options to help you attain the peace of mind you may be seeking. We are all in this together.
